- Q&A

- Work on the long term plan has started, with around 20 working groups identified to bring together proposals to improve outcomes across the NHS over the next 10 years and demonstrate effective investment of the additional funds the NHS will receive over the next five years.
- This includes a number of clinical priorities where we know that, despite improving performance, we can do better, including maternal and child health, care for the frail elderly, people with long term conditions, cancer, prevention and health inequalities.
- Each working group is led by a senior leader from NHS England or NHS Improvement – or one of the other ALBs where appropriate – and each group will also have senior clinical and NHS-wide leadership input. The list of who is leading the working groups has been shared with all staff on our intranets.
- Steve Powis, NHS England Medical Director, is leading a review of clinical standards, with clinical colleagues across the system to support him, with the aim of ensuring standards we ask the NHS to achieve will drive improvements in clinical outcomes.

Joint working programme

- Single system leadership
- Shared set of priorities
- Streamlining our interface
- All roles joint NHSE/I
